About LEGENDS OF AMÉRICA

Selection of eight stories from the south of the American continent that rescue the diversity of the mythical visions of the native peoples of America. They are stories of fantastic or supernatural events about the world that surrounded them since the beginning of time, full of symbols that gave richness to their culture. Sacred trees, small birds that announce the arrival of the winds and women transformed into flowers are some of the characters in these stories in which the wise elders were consulted for mystical journeys. to the past and for advice.

About THE STORY GAME

Three short stories on illustrated postcards that can become more than 100 new stories by combining characters, places, actions or outcomes from the texts or illustrations. In one of the stories we find Mawo, a red fox who lives in Guachipas. In another to Lucero, a girl who lives in Parque Chas, Buenos Aires and in the next to Inken who, as her Tehuelche name indicates, always carries a long feather when running through the forests of the Cholila Valley in Argentine Patagonia. An experience that encourages creativity through play and the composition of new stories from texts or images and based on the basic structure of the sentence: introduction, middle and end.

About THE BANDURRIA

Bandurrias were birds that flew at the beginning of spring and the Yagán people celebrated the event. But the bandurria, did not like the shouting, she was a calm and delicate bird, so angry at the commotion, she sent a great storm over that town and the people could not get any food. The famine was so great that, since then, when someone from the town sees a bandurria flying towards it, they remain silent. Thus it prevents, perhaps, that the bandurria brings the great storm.

About KUYÉN AND HER REFLECTION

For the Ranquels, the sun, the moon, the earth, water and air are a source of food, protection and wisdom. On many occasions they star in their stories, such as in this legend of Kuyén, the moon. When nothing still existed, the cold and darkness of the earth required the creation of the sun, but so that he would not be alone, Kuyén appeared. What must have happened so that she can look at her reflection in the water only on some nights? This story rescues those stories passed down from family to family by the hand of a young local writer.

About THE DEVOURING FOG

At the beginning, when everything already existed but also began to be created, there were the winds and their relative the fog that the Onas called Chalpe. The winds were temperamental and punished the inhabitants and the fog enveloped them with its vapor and caused them to fear. One morning, one of the Onas took courage and went into the fog, but to his surprise, he saw a woman's form rise up. The ona fell in love with her and disappeared into the thicket, no one saw him again. But they say that their screams can be heard, sometimes heartbreaking, sometimes whispering, calling the children to come closer to the fog to devour them.

About THE MORNING'S COLORS

A delicate collection of poems that makes one travel through various landscapes, among which you will experience sunrise in the countryside, the savannah, lagoons, beaches and even mountain ranges and ravines. Each poem is associated with a different color that is interlinked to the animals that inhabit the land, as well as the flowers that blossom there, the trees that characterize them and, also, morning routines. Meanwhile, the night sheltered in the city, goes to sleep, covered in a black cloak. It all begins when an alligator yawn welcomes the morning, waking up the swamp. The main character will later be the woods where the bears and the rabbits step away from their laziness and so follow different scenarios. With visual metaphors and verses we reach the final poem, which calls readers to paint and write about their own mornings

BOSQUE

Suena un despertador de hojas,
el oso se despereza:
abandonan los conejos
sus pijamas de corteza,
y guarda el puercoespín
su sueño y su pereza.
"¡Buen día!", saluda el viento
desde su madriguera.
Callada se va la noche
llevándose su fiereza."

Bufanda de viento
se pone el hornero,
sombbrero de trinos
y un poncho pampero.

Vestido con flecos
del campo celeste
parece un jinete.

About ABOUT POETRY

The poems that we present are part of our "Illustrated Poems" collection and are a selection of eight texts with their cheerful and delicate illustrations on small scenes of daily life and also of fantasy. They do not lack fear or nonsense, animals and enchanted raindrops that the authors offer readers through words that can be read, sung, recited and enjoyed together with images in a double language game: the image and the word.

About A MAGICAL WINDOW

Games have always been fundamental elements to develop all our intelligence and are also a central activity for the development of boys and girls.

Playing forms better social bonds and improves health and self-esteem.

In a society where screens often replace the gaze, bonding games have been somewhat forgotten. "A magical window" reminds us that a knowing, mischievous, angry or laughing look is learned by boys and girls quickly. and fun through these ancient games where the eyes of the babies are attentive to the actions of the adults.
